QUESTION PRESENTED

In the Motor Carrier Act of 1980, Congress expressed its intent that "the Interstate Commerce Commission should be given explicit direction for regulation of the motor carrier industry and well defined parameters within which it may act pursuant to Congressional policy." The ICC, the statute warns, should not "attempt to go beyond the powers vested in it" by statute (Sections 2 and 3 of the Motor Carrier Act of 1980, 94 Stat. 783). In Section 14 of that Act, Congress established a series of explicit requirements and restrictions governing motor carrier rate bureaus.

Against this background, the question presented by this case is as follows:

> Given Congress's expressed intent to limit the regulatory authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission over rate bureaus by explicitly defining the requirements and restrictions which are to govern them, can the ICC under the guise of "interpreting and implementing" the 1980 Act establish new requirements and restrictions on rate bureaus that Congress did not impose?

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Petitioners respectfully pray that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit in this case.

OPINIONS AND ORDERS BELOW

The Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States filed a petition for a writ of certiorari in this case which was docketed as No. 82-1643 in this Court on April 7, 1983. References in this petition to "Appendix" will be to the appendix filed with the petition in No. 82-1643.

The opinion of the Court of Appeals, reported at 688 F.2d 1337, appears in Appendix A, 1a-31a, and the judgment appears in Appendix C, 92a-93a. The order of the Court of Appeals denying rehearing appears in Appendix D, 94a-95a. The decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission are reported at 45 Fed. Reg. 55734, 46 Fed. Reg. 30092 and 364 I.C.C. 921, and appear in Appendix B, 32a-72a, 73a-84a, and 85a-91a.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was entered on October 12, 1982. A petition for rehearing was denied on January 7, 1983. This petition is filed pursuant to Rule 19.5 of this Court. The petition for certiorari in connection with which this cross-petition is filed was received on April 11, 1983. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1).

RELEVANT STATUTES

Relevant provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, 49 U.S.C. §§ 10706, 10762, 11701, and 11705 appear in Appendix E, 96a-100a.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

In Ex Parte No. 297 (Sub-No. 5), Motor Carrier Rate Bureaus—Implementation of P.L. 96-296, the Interstate Commerce Commission promulgated a number of rules which purport to interpret and implement certain provisions of Section 14 of the Motor Carrier Act of 1980 governing the operations of rate bureaus. The petitioners include the major motor carrier rate bureaus. These rate bureaus perform their functions under procedures set forth in agreements which are filed with the ICC and which, if they comply with the requirements and restrictions in section 10706(b) of the Interstate Commerce Act, are required to be approved by the ICC. The ICC's approval of an agreement immunizes from "the antitrust laws" the "parties and other persons with respect to making or carrying out the agreement." 49 U.S.C. § 10706(b).[1]

A typical agreement provides that any person may submit for collective action by the carriers, a proposal to establish or change a rate or rates in the bureau's tariffs. Notice of proposals are regularly distributed to all carrier members of the bureau and to all members of the public who subscribe to the bureau's docket bulletin. All proposals that would effect significant changes in rates are referred to a committee of carrier members.[2] Following a public discussion among carriers, shippers, and any other persons wishing to participate, the committee either approves, disapproves or modifies the proposal. Approved or modified proposals are published in the tariffs.

Each agreement also provides that any member carrier may, in the exercise of its right of independent action, direct the publication in the tariffs for its own account of any rates it desires. The agreements do not provide any means for discussion or voting upon independent action rates in advance of their filing with the ICC. However, the agreements uniformly require advance notice of independent actions prior to their filing.

The rule challenged here would require the carriers to modify their existing agreements to provide that a carrier

See S. Rep. No. 44, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. (1947).

[2] Proposals of a minor nature to which no carrier or shipper objects may be automatically published in the tariffs.

may bypass the procedures set forth in the agreements requiring advance notice of independent actions.[3] Specifically, the ICC required that the agreements be amended to provide that:

> (1) Proponents of independent actions have the absolute right to decide whether or when rate bureaus will docket these actions;
> (2) The bureau must comply with the instructions of the proponent of an independent action with regard to whether or not the action should be docketed, and in the absence of explicit instructions shall refrain from docketing until the proposal has been filed with the Commission (Appendix B, 37a, footnote omitted).[4]

This so-called independent action rule was opposed by shippers and carriers alike.[5] The shippers were primarily concerned that the rule would permit carriers to hide rate increases in lengthy and complex bureau tariffs and thus prevent shippers from making an immediate response to the increases. The shippers pointed out that unless in-

[3] This petition involves only the so-called independent action rule. In the Court of Appeals, petitioners challenged several of the rules adopted in Ex Parte No. 297 (Sub-No. 5). The Court held one rule invalid for failure to comply with notice and comment procedures and another invalid as being in conflict with the Interstate Commerce Act, but it upheld the other rules, including the one which is challenged here (Appendix A, 1a-31a).

[4] Docketing, as the Court of Appeals noted, consists of "informing bureau members and the subscribing public of proposed rates prior to submitting rates to the ICC" (Appendix A, 2a).

[5] The vast majority of shippers and carriers who filed statements with the ICC objected to the independent action rule. Two national organizations representing shippers and eight organizations representing carriers intervened in the Court of Appeals in support of petitioners' challenge to the rule.

creases are highlighted in the docket bulletins, they may not be aware of them until the increases take effect. Thus, they may miss the opportunity to request the ICC to reject or suspend and investigate the increases or to make arrangements to obtain the services of a lower-priced carrier. The carriers were primarily concerned that the rule would prevent competing carriers from making an immediate response to rate decreases because of the delay inherent in the 30-day filing requirement of the Act.[6] The shippers and the carriers were in total agreement that the rule would not accomplish its stated purpose of enhancing competition. Indeed, as both groups showed, it would have the opposite effect. Nevertheless, the ICC found that "[a]dvance docketing is not essential to the best interest of shippers, carriers, and the general public" (Appendix B, 43a). The Court of Appeals affirmed this finding, holding that "the Commission's independent action rule is but an interpretation of the statutory right of independent action" (Appendix A, 12a). It thus found "no compelling reason to depart from the Commission's interpretation" (Appendix A, 15a).

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

In affirming the ICC's independent action rule, the Court of Appeals "decided a federal question in a way in conflict with applicable decisions of this Court" (Rule 17.1(a)). As this Court has stated, the ICC's rulemaking authority is sharply limited by two constraints. First, the ICC may exercise such authority only to the extent it is [6] Pursuant to 49 U.S.C. § 10762(d)(1), a tariff filed with the ICC generally becomes effective only after a waiting period of 30 days. Hence, if a rate decrease is filed without advance notice, competing carriers cannot make an immediate competitive response to the decrease as could competitors in virtually every other industry.

statutorily vested with it. American Trucking Ass'ns. v. United States, 344 U.S. 298 (1953). Second, the ICC may not use its rulemaking power to create new law. The power to adopt rules is no more than the power "to carry into effect the will of Congress." Ernst & Ernst v. Hochfelder, 425 U.S. 185, 213-214 (1976).

The Motor Carrier Act of 1980 was adopted largely in response to the ICC's abuse of these limitations, an abuse of power manifest with respect to its regulation of rate bureaus. In recent years, the ICC has gone on record in favor of severely curtailing the collective ratemaking process.[7] It has attempted to use its rulemaking authority, in furtherance of its efforts to "deregulate" the motor carrier industry, to drastically curtail collective ratemaking. For example, in Ex Parte No. 297 (Sub-No. 3), Modified Terms and Conditions for Approval of Collective Ratemaking Agreements (43 Fed. Reg. 1809, January 12, 1978), the ICC proposed to do what Congress had specifically declined to do, namely, apply to motor carrier rate bureaus the severe restrictions on collective ratemaking statutorily imposed on rail rate bureaus by the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976, Pub. L. 94-210, 49 U.S.C. § 10706(a). And, in Ex Parte No. 297 (Sub-No. 4), Reopening of Section 10706(b) Application Proceedings (43 Fed. Reg. 1666, January 11, 1978), the ICC undertook to review individual ratemaking agreements to determine if continued approval would be warranted under a new standard adopted by it. The ICC's standard required the parties to an agreement to show not only that the agreement enhanced the goals of the National Transportation Policy,[8] the only showing then required by statute, but also that it did not have anticompetitive effects or that, if it did, those effects were outweighed by the benefits to the National Transportation Policy.[9]

When Congress began to deal in earnest with motor carrier regulation and collective ratemaking in 1979, Congressional leaders roundly condemned the ICC's efforts to rewrite the regulatory scheme by rule. For example, on October 22, 1979, the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation, which considered the Motor Carrier Act of 1980, expressed the concern of Congress when he said:

> I do not believe that the ICC should embark upon a course of action to redefine completely and unilaterally our national transportation policies. . . . To borrow a phrase, we are mad as hell, and we're not going to take it anymore. It is time that the agencies began to listen to the Congress, and it is time for the Congress to be much more explicit in the direction that it believes Federal Agencies should be moving.[10]

The Motor Carrier Act of 1980 was specially tailored to restrain the ICC from charting its regulatory course outside the boundaries of its governing statute. After giving paramount importance to the need to "reduce unnecessary regulation," the Act sets forth Congress's finding that "the Interstate Commerce Commission should be given explicit direction for regulation of the motor carrier industry and well defined parameters within which it may act pursuant to Congressional policy." Sections 2 and 3 of the Motor Carrier Act of 1980, 94 Stat. 783. The ICC, the statute warns, should not "attempt to go beyond the powers vested in it" by statute. Section 3(a) of the Motor Carrier Act of 1980, 94 Stat. 783.

The Motor Carrier Act of 1980 gives "explicit direction" to the ICC with respect to the regulation of rate bureaus. As the Court of Appeals noted in its decision:

> Under the old provisions of the Act the ICC exercised sole discretion over the approval of rate bureau agreements. In § 14 of the Motor Carrier Act of 1980, however, Congress enacted a detailed set of statutory restrictions with which motor carrier rate bureaus must comply in order to obtain approval of their agreements from the ICC (Appendix A, 2a).

Section 14 covers such minute details as the time limits for bureau decisionmaking on rate proposals, a requirement that proxies be in writing, a restriction against bureau employees acting on proposals, and a requirement that upon request, the bureau must divulge to any person the name of the proponent of a proposal. In short, Congress itself made both the substantive and the procedural rules which are to govern rate bureaus. Furthermore, Section 14 compels the ICC to approve collective ratemaking agreements that are consistent with the explicit statutory requirements and restrictions unless it finds that an agreement is inconsistent with the National Transportation Policy. Hence, there is no discretion for the ICC to exercise by rulemaking. The House Report confirmed this when it said:

> In other parts of the rate bureau section of the bill, the Committee has proposed to reduce the amount of discretion that the Commission has to approve or > disapprove rate bureau agreements. This reduction in Commission discretion goes hand-in-hand with the other reforms proposed in the rate bureau process. This is a clear example of Congress defining the limits which it believes the Commission should follow and reducing the discretion of the Commission to expand those limits. When the parties to an agreement meet all the conditions in the section, there is a presumption that the Commission should find the agreement to be in the public interest (H. Rpt., No. 96-1069, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. (1980) at p. 29).

Similar language appears at page 31 of the Senate Report (S. Rep. No. 96-641, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. (1980)).

The ICC's action in adopting the independent action rule exceeds the limits set by Congress. The rule permitting carriers to forbid bureaus to give advance notice of their independent actions finds no predicate in the Motor Carrier Act of 1980. As the Court of Appeals noted in its decision, "[t]he right of independent action was contained in the original Reed-Bulwinkle Act" (Appendix A, 12a). To the extent Congress addressed the right of independent action in Section 14, by adding new Section 10706(b)(3)(B)(ii) to the Interstate Commerce Act, it simply restated what the Reed-Bulwinkle Act has required since its enactment, namely, that the right of independent action be "free and unrestrained,"[11] and codified ICC rules defining the circumstances under which bureaus may change or cancel independent action rates.[12] Since the Section 14 amendments do not alter the status quo with respect to the docketing of independent actions, the ICC's rule doing so is a plain effort "to go beyond the powers vested in it" by the very explicit terms of Section 14.

[11] Former Section 5a(6), former 49 U.S.C. § 5b(6). In the 1978 recodification, the words "free and unrestrained" were changed to "absolute right . . . to take independent action." Former Section 10706(c)(2)(C), former U.S.C. § 10706(c)(2)(C).

In its decision, the Court of Appeals acknowledged that "Congress in the Motor Carrier Act of 1980 intended to restrict significantly the discretion of the ICC to issue regulations enlarging on the motor carrier provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act" (Appendix A, 6a). It further stated that the "Commission's legislative power to prescribe additional conditions for agreement approval has been tempered with the presumption that new conditions the Commission imposes are unnecessary" (Appendix A, 7a). The Court then stated that if "the Commission purports to exercise its delegated authority to create new conditions that have the force of law, then the presumption described above attaches, for the Commission is going beyond the terms of the statute when its own rules are the source of the duty imposed on the rate bureaus" (Appendix A, 7a-8a, footnote omitted). The Court held, however:

> Here the Commission's purpose was to interpret and implement the 1980 Act, not to impose new conditions that go beyond the Act. In its interim notice of rulemaking the Commission stated that "[i]n this proceeding the Commission will interpret and implement [the] new [statutory provision]" 45 Fed. Reg. 55734 (Appendix A, 8a).

The Court concluded that the "presumption discussed above does not apply because the Commission has not attempted to go beyond the statutory conditions" (Appendix A, 9a).

As the above makes clear, the Court's conclusion is based on faulty premises. As shown, the independent action rule finds no predicate in the Motor Carrier Act of 1980. Clearly, therefore, the ICC did not merely "interpret and implement the new statutory provision." It imposed "new conditions that go beyond the Act." Those conditions are obviously intended to "have the force of law," since the ICC ordered the carriers to amend their agreements to conform to them.

The ICC sought to avoid the shortcomings in its rule by claiming that the conditions imposed were not new, i.e., that the right of independent action has always embraced the right of an independent actor to determine docketing procedures when publishing its independent action in a bureau tariff. While it made no findings on this point, and it recognized "that the Commission's position concerning a mandatory, prefiling waiting period has not always been consistent" (Appendix A, 13a, n. 14), the Court placed great emphasis on two 1956 and 1957 ICC decisions which were purportedly "to the effect" that such a waiting period "is advisory only and not mandatory" (Appendix A, 13a). However, the facts do not support the ICC's claim.

First, the ICC-approved ratemaking agreements of the petitioner bureaus as well as all other ICC-approved ratemaking agreements set forth advance docketing procedures in mandatory terms. And, consistent with the ICC's long-held views, the carriers have always considered themselves bound by the terms of their agreements. Thus, as the ICC admitted in its decision here, no carrier has ever sought to exercise a purported right to avoid or ignore approved mandatory bureau procedures (Appendix B, 43a).

Moreover, in 1967, in Notice of Independent Action, 332 I.C.C. 22, 23, 29 (1967), the Commission recognized that advance notice of independent actions by rate bureaus is "common practice and one which we have approved . . ." and that "the Commission has approved the regulations and procedural rules of rate conferences which provide that the conference will give notice to its other members of independent action." (Emphasis supplied.) "[T]he mere giving of public notice," the Commission held, "in no way infringes upon the right of a member of a conference to take independent action." 332 I.C.C. at 29-30. On the basis of these findings, the Commission required, without exception or qualification, that notice of independent actions to be published in bureau tariffs be given to the public "to the same extent and in the same manner" that bureau agreements provide for notice of proposals for collective consideration. The Commission further required that all approved Section 5a Agreements be amended to include that rule. 336 I.C.C. at 32.[13] Petitioners therefore submit that the independent action rule is, in fact, a reversal of the past rule and it is a reversal not justified by any provision of the Motor Carrier Act of 1980.

Petitioners further submit that the Motor Carrier Act of 1980 contemplates a continuation of the past rule covering advance notice. Had Congress, which had exhaustively studied rate bureaus and prescribed detailed rules to govern them, desired or intended to impose a rule such as that involved here, it obviously would have done so in the statute.

[13] The Court of Appeal's assertion that the rule applies "only when an independent action 'is announced', i.e., docketed" (Appendix A, 14a, n. 14) is plainly wrong. As the ICC's decision makes clear, the rule was drafted with great precision. The wording of the proposed rule set forth in the notice of rulemaking was changed by the hearing examiner in the initial decision, and again by the Commission in the final decision. Had the Commission intended to restrict the rule in the manner suggested by the Court, it would have used the term "docketed." As noted that term has a restricted meaning. That the choice of the broader term "announced" was deliberate is clear from the context of the decision as shown above.

Moreover, specific evidence that Congress approved of the practice whereby bureaus provide advance notice of independent actions is found in Section 11 of the Motor Carrier Act. That section, adding Section 10708(d)(4) to Title 49, provides that although the new zone of rate freedom rates may not be collectively made, and thus are to be handled as independent actions, "the docketing and publication of such rate by the carrier under Section 10706(b) of this title shall not be construed as a violation of the antitrust laws." Docketing, as the Court of Appeal's decision recognizes, consists of "informing bureau members and the subscribing public of proposed rates prior to submitting rates to the ICC" (Appendix A, 2a). Further, only advance notice procedures would implicate the antitrust laws. See Cement Mfrs.' Protective Ass'n. v. United States, 268 U.S. 586 (1926). Congress, therefore, knew and approved of existing procedures under which "docketing" an independent action to be published in a bureau tariff includes advance notice of such publication to carriers and shippers. Since it chose not to alter the status quo with respect to these procedures, the Commission was without authority to do so.

CONCLUSION

The petition for a writ of certiorari should be granted.
